This article delves into the enigmatic world of Genesis Breyer Orridge and Thee Third Mind ov, examining their groundbreaking art, concepts, and influence on identity, gender, and creativity.

The Early Years: Throbbing Gristle and Industrial Music

Genesis Breyer P-Orridge and Cosey Fanni Tutti formed Throbbing Gristle in 1975, along with Peter Christopherson and Chris Carter. The band's raw and abrasive industrial music, characterized by distorted electronics, experimental sound manipulation, and transgressive lyrics, became a cornerstone of the burgeoning industrial music scene.

Throbbing Gristle's performances were equally confrontational, often featuring extreme body modification, ritualistic elements, and a rejection of traditional musical conventions. Their music and art challenged societal taboos, exploring themes of sexuality, violence, and the occult.

Thee Third Mind ov: Performance Art and Identity

In the late 1970s, Genesis Breyer P-Orridge and Lady Jaye Breyer P-Orridge founded Thee Third Mind ov, a multimedia art collective that further expanded their exploration of identity and gender.

Thee Third Mind ov's performances were highly ritualistic, incorporating elements of body modification, occultism, and the surreal. Genesis and Lady Jaye's own bodies became the canvas for their art, as they underwent extensive body modifications in an attempt to transcend the limitations of traditional gender roles.

One of Thee Third Mind ov's most famous performances was the "Prostitution" exhibition in 1976, where Genesis and Lady Jaye offered their bodies for sale in a gallery setting. This controversial performance challenged the commodification of the body and the boundaries of art and society.

Pandrogeny and Identity Fluidity

Central to Genesis Breyer Orridge and Thee Third Mind ov's work is the concept of pandrogeny, a term they coined to describe a state of gender fluidity and the transcendence of traditional gender roles.

Genesis and Lady Jaye believed that the traditional male/female binary was limiting and artificial. They embraced the idea of a third gender, beyond the confines of conventional definitions, and sought to embody this concept through their own lives and art.

Their "Pandrogyné Project," begun in the 1990s, saw Genesis and Lady Jaye undergo extensive plastic surgery to resemble each other, physically manifesting their shared identity as a single pandrogyné being.

Occultism and Esotericism

Genesis Breyer Orridge and Thee Third Mind ov were deeply influenced by occultism and esotericism. Their work often drew inspiration from ancient myths, alchemical traditions, and the writings of mystics and philosophers.

Genesis believed that art had the potential to be a transformative force, capable of unlocking hidden knowledge and connecting individuals with the divine. Their performances and installations incorporated ritualistic elements, symbols, and incantations, blurring the lines between art and spirituality.
